Public Sentiment on Doe Killing.

In a convenient place in the fishery building at the state fair there were two blank books one, with a red cover and the other in a black covering. Over the shelf on which they rested was a sign requesting visitors to register their opinion as to the shooting of does in the open season. Those in favor of the slaughter were asked to write their names in the red book; those opposed to sign their names in the other book.

On Wednesday afternoon each book had received a considerable number of signatures, there being perhaps 25 percent more in the black covered book. While this will not determine positively the sentiment of the state in the matter the scheme was not a bad one, whoever may have been responsible for it. If the next legislature amends the deer law to allow the owner, or any person authorized by him, to shoot a deer that is in the act of destroying his crops, the News is of the opinion that there would remain very little sentiment in favor of killing does.—Northfield News.
